

NO. 119

THE ATHEIST AND THE POPE.

Mr. Jang, alias M. Leo Taxil Implores the Forgiveness of the Holy Father on His Knees.

A curious scene was witnessed the other day at the Vatican. M. Leo Taxil, whose real name is Jang, and who formerly wrote some of the most "anti-clerical" works ever printed, according to his own account, while composing a diatribe against John of Arc he had to refer to the history of her trial and condemnation, and was so struck with the angelic character of the heroine that he felt himself suddenly converted to the very faith he was abusing.

He proceeded instantly to Rome, to implore the Pope's forgiveness and blessing. His holiness at once granted him private audience, which lasted half an hour, during which he went at the feet of the holy father. At length the Pope consented to give him his blessing on the condition that in his future works he would labor to undo all the harm he had done to the Catholic church. M. Leo Taxil promised he would do his best, and departed. Before leaving, however, he had to make the pious confession that he had not yet been able to convert his wife, who remained a hardened atheist.

"The Old Woman."

Look into yonder window! What do you see? Nothing new, surely; nothing but what the angels have looked smilingly down upon since the morning stars first sang together; nothing but a loving mother hushing upon her faithful breast a wailing babe, whose little life hangs by a slender thread. Mortal lips have said, "the boy must die!"

A mother's hope never dies. She clasps him closer to her breast, and gazes upwards, food and sleep and rest are forgotten, so that the little flickering taper die not out. Gently upon her soft, warm breast she weaves for its baby slumbers; long, weary nights, up and down the cottage floor she paces, soothing its restless moaning. Suns rise and set—stars pale—seasons come and go; she heeds them not, so that those languid eyes but beam brightness. Down the meadow—by the brook—on the hillside—she seeks with him the health-restoring breeze.

Health comes at last! What joy to see that rosy flush mantle on the pallid cheek!—what joy to see shrunken limbs grow round with health!—what joy to see the damp, thin locks grow crisp and glossy!

What matter though the knitting lie neglected, or the spinning-wheel be dumb, so that the soaring kite or bounding ball pleases his boyish fancy, and prompt the gleeful shout? What matter that the coarser fare be hers, so that the daintier morsel pass his rosy lips? What matter that her sole be thread-bare, so that his graceful limbs be clad in warm garments? What matter that her couch be hard, so that his sunny head rests nightly on a downy pillow? What matter that her slender purse be empty so that his childish heart may never know denial?

Years roll on. That loving mother's age grows dim; her glossy locks are silvered; her limbs are sharp and shrunken; her footsteps slow and tottering. And the boy!—the cherished child!—he of the bold, bright age, an sinewy limb, and bounding step? Surely from his kind hand small flowers be strewn on the dim, downward path to the dark valley; surely will her son's strong arm be her's to lean on; his voice of nurse sweeter to her dull ear than seraphic singing.

No, no!—the hum of busy life has struck upon his ear; drowning the voice of love. He has become a man! refined, fastidious!—and to his forgetful, unfilial heart (God forgive him), the mother who bore him is only—woman!

No love like the love of a mother
When trials are gathering fast.
Ah, mother! there's no love like a mother's
So noble, forgiving and true.

The Alps.

One cannot command any language to convey an adequate idea of this magnificence. You are standing far below, gazing up to where the great dome of the glittering Alps cuts the heavens, and drinking in the influence of the silent, solemn, awful. So deeply an enormous mass of snow an ice, in itself a mountain, seems to move; it breaks from the towering, outmost mountain ridge of snow, where it is hundreds of feet in depth, and in its first fall of perhaps 2000 feet, is broken into millions of fragments. As you first see the flash of distant artillery by night, then hear the roar, so you may see the white, flashing mass majestically bowing, and hear the astonishing din. A cloud of dusty, white, dry snow rises into the air from the foot of the mountain, forming a white volume of fleecy smoke, or mist light from the forest of which thousands of the ice are torn in the second precipitous fall over the rocky battlements. The eye follows it as it dashes as it plunges through the path which preceding avalanches have worn, till it comes to the brink of a vast ridge of bare rock, perhaps more than 2000 feet perpendicular. Then flows the whole, entrained over the gulf with a dull, muffled roar of eddying waters. Another, still of still greater depth, comes pouring over a second similar and still higher ridge of rock in the next of the mountain, with an awful majestic roar, and a tremulous crash in its tremendous, eddying, rushing, and a variety of other sounds. Then the torrent is on its way to the sea, till it at length reaches a mighty gully of snow and ice like the first, where the Pillars of which Chertsey has given so powerfully and graphic description. Here its progress is slower, and most of all you listen to the roar of the falling torrents as they drop out of sight, with deafening, and into the bottom of the gulf, to rest their journey.

THIEVES AND THIEVERY.

Some Characteristics of England's Light-Fingered Country.

Although a man always looks upon a clever thief with an air of romance, he never quite realizes the position until the thief or sharper has fled from him. We are apt to laugh at the misfortune of the man who puts his head out of his car on a foggy day in answer to a knock at the window, and thus his hat disappears in the gloom. Nor do we show more sympathy with the man who collides with another individual in the street, and who, on having his hat, which has been handed down with profuse apologies for the accident, finds from its size and general appearance that not many hours before it must have adorned a scoundrel. But these incidents in no way illustrate the cunning and interplay of the professional thief, who does not usually aim at trifles. Last winter, an ingenious thief was perpetrated.

BY TWO WELL-KNOWN PICKPOCKETS

who had followed a gentleman out of the stalls of a Leeds theatre. For a moment they parted company, and when the younger joined his companion he handed him a pocket-book, from which he took some notes and money. To substitute this note was the work of a second. "You have lost your pocket-book, sir," said the elder thief, hurrying after the gentleman. With a cool bow, the thief hastened away, pleased with the gentleman's thanks—and his watch. At Birmingham, not long ago, a thief was detected in the act of stealing a gentleman's watch. In his haste to escape he ran into the arms of a detective, who had been watching him for some time. Naturally the thief must have felt somewhat excited at such a moment; but if he did, he showed no symptoms of being so. Although instantly secured by the unmovable iron hands, he had the presence of mind to pass the watch unobserved into the pocket of a passer-by. This person was puzzled to know how he bore no loss of possession of the watch, and being afraid of keeping the gift, was sufficiently honest to hand it to the police. Another instance of the remarkable coolness and audacity of a thief, though perhaps not an uncommon one, is worth relating. One day, a Liverpool "stake"—a man capable of doing mischief of any kind for a trifle—having watched his opportunity, took up a coat that hung outside a pawnbroker's shop. Flung it over his arm, and carrying it into the shop, he intended to make a purchase. He offered it for sale. Not recognizing his own property, the pawnbroker bought the coat. But even this did not satisfy the thief. He handled some silk handkerchiefs, and in choosing one, remarked carelessly: "Take pay for this out of the money or the coat." "But I have given you the money," indignantly answered the pawnbroker. "O no; you haven't," said the thief.

A WARM ALTERCATION ENSUED.

In vain the shopman protested that he had paid the money; and at last the thief went out in search of another to settle the dispute, taking with him some silver coins, several silk handkerchiefs, as well as the silk handkerchief in question, which in his excitement the broker had forgotten. But this thief is not at all ways a cool and collected as we are wont to believe him. He is especially unnerved by hunger and the police. Not long ago, a well-known actor, while in the provinces, had occasion to walk some distance at midnight, and was stopped on a lonely road by an ill-dressed ruffian. "Fool!" muttered the actor coolly, "there's an officer within a hundred yards of us; I'll—!" With an exclamation the thief disappeared over a wall; and the next morning his dead body was found in a river close by, into which his master he had fallen.

SOME FIVE OR SIX YEARS AGO, the shopkeepers of Bradford were thrown into a state of alarm by a couple of young lads. One of the two used to make a small purchase at a shop, and by telling a plausible tale that a boy outside would take the purchase from him if it were seen, he got the shopman to put the articles down the back of his coat. While thus employed, the ingenious youth very easily relieved the shopman of his watch, and then boasted. After him came "the boy outside," to inform the shopman of his loss. The latter having had carefully described to him the lad the thief had not taken, ran at once after the culprit; the second boy in this meantime helping himself to the contents of the till. How often this larceny was practiced few shopmen in Bradford care to remember. Once, for the writer's edification, a young lad, not more than fifteen years of age, undertook to stand in a prominent thoroughfare in Leeds and on the ladies' articles as they passed, without being observed. He never failed, and very often succeeded in taking out their purses also, which, of course, were immediately returned intact. It is often argued, that if taken from their evil associates, many thieves would reform. It is very doubtful; they have their relations and their friends too closely. One instance in support of this is enough. A clergyman in Bradford once interested himself in the welfare of a penniless thief, and secured a situation for him in South Australia. But while at his benefactor's house, listening to the bright prospects that awaited him, the thief was stealing the good man's pocket watch and ring. The chances of becoming rich in a day are further inducements, as in the case of the gambler, to continue their life of recklessness and crime.

A woman gave her little boy two bright new pennies and asked him what he was going to do with them. After a moment's thought, the child replied: "I am going to give one to the misbehaviors and with the other I am going to buy a stick of candy." After a while he returned from his play and told his mother that he had lost one of the pennies. "When did you lose it?" she asked. "I lost the misbehaviors penny," he promptly replied. How many grown people are like that little boy!

GREAT EXCITEMENT.

The Scene at Lincoln's Nomination.

The following is from the September installment of The Century's Life of Lincoln:

"Though it was not expected to be decisive, the very first ballot fore-shadowed accurately the final result. The 'complimentary' candidates received tribute of admiration from their respective states. Vermont voted for Colamer, and New Jersey for Dayton, each solid. Pennsylvania's compliment to Cameron was shown of six votes, four of which went at once for Lincoln. Ohio divided her compliment, 34 for Chase, 4 for McLean, and at once gave Lincoln her 8 remaining votes. Missouri voted solid for her candidate, Bates, who also received a scattering tribute from other delegations. But all these compliments were of little avail to their recipients, for far above towered the aggregates of the leading candidates: Seward, 173; Lincoln, 102.

"In the ground-swell of suppressed excitement which pervaded the convention there was no time to analyze the votes, nevertheless, delegates and spectators felt the full force of its pronouncement: to all who desired the defeat of Seward it pointed out the winning man with unerring certainty. Another like scenario ever some disputed and protesting delegate made the audience almost inured to the delay, and 'all the rail' sounded from a thousand throats.

"A second ballot was begun at last, and, leaving a force as size as the law of gravitation the former complimentary votes came rushing to Lincoln. The whole 10 votes of Colamer, 41 from Vermont, 6 from Chase and McLean, were now cast for him, followed by a scatter of additions along the whole roll call. In this ballot Lincoln gained 79 votes, Seward only 11. The faces of the New York delegation whitened as the balloting progressed and the torrent of Lincoln's popularity became a river. The result of the second ballot was: Seward, 184; Lincoln, 21; scattering 20. When the vote of Lincoln was announced, there was a tremendous burst of applause, which the chairman prudently but with difficulty controlled and silenced.

"The third ballot was begun, and a breathless suspense; hundreds of pencils kept pace with the roll call, and nervously marked the changes on their tally sheets. The Lincoln figures steadily swelled and grew. Notes came to him from all the other candidates, —43 from Seward, 2 from Cameron, 13 from Bates, 18 from Chase, 9 from Dayton, 11 from McLean, 1 from Ohio. Lincoln had gained 50, Seward had lost 11. Long before these final tallies were in their respective seats, the delegates rapidly marked the reckoning, and the result was: Seward, 231; Lincoln, 20; Cameron 11; Bates 10; Chase 10; Dayton 10; McLean 10; and 123 were necessary to a choice. Only 1 vote more was needed to make a nomination.

"A profound silence fell upon the assembly, the men ceased to talk and the women to whisper. One man, however, near the rear of the hall, was looking at a group of instructions on the reporters' table. No announcement had been made by the clerk, and there was a murmur. It was only a question of seconds who should speak next. While every one was looking forward in intense expectancy, Mr. Carter sprang upon his chair and reported a change of four Ohio votes from Chase to Lincoln. There was a moment's pause, a titter waved his hand toward the skylight and shouted a name, —and then the boom of a cannon on the roof of the wigwam announced the nomination to the crowds in the streets, where shouts and salutes took up and spread the news. In the convention the Lincoln river now bore a new foundation. Amid the wildest hurrahs delegates after delegates changed their vote to the victor.

"A graceful custom prevails in orderly American conventions, that the chairman of the vanquished delegation is first to greet the nominee with a short address of party fealty and a promise of party support. Mr. Evans, the spokesman for New York, essayed promptly to perform this courteous office, but was delayed a while by the enthusiasm and confusion. The sun at length subsided, and the presiding officer announced that on the third ballot Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, received 202 votes, and is selected as your candidate for president of the United States! Then Mr. Evans, in a voice of unmeasured emotion, but with admirable dignity and touching eloquence speaking for Seward and for New York, moved to make the nomination unanimous.

Bird Legends.

Following are a few of the many bird legends that people with bright imaginations and ready inventions have connected with feathered musicians.

The poor cuckoo, whose mournful cry sounds so desolate in the quiet wood, is always mourning for the death of a beloved mother. The cuckoo was originally a beautiful young maiden. She caused her brother's death unintentionally, and was changed into the bird whose sad cry is an expression of her bitter grief.

The owl was also once a beautiful young girl. She was a baker's daughter. One day a good man, passing by, asked for a piece of bread. She refused it, and as a punishment was changed into an owl. In Germany the owl and the lark are sacred birds, and their morning song is considered a hymn.

The nightingale, you know, only sings at night. This was not so formerly. One night a nightingale fell fast asleep, and the tendrils of the vine it sat upon grew round its feet, so that it could not get away, and finally it died. Since then the other nightingales never dared sleep at night.

A Boston scientist predicts that within twenty years chemistry will show how sea water can be made suitable to drinking and for culinary purposes more cheaply for seaboard cities than fresh water can be brought for any considerable distance.
